DARK TAPESTRY

by Ruthie Pearlman

"Oh, don't worry. They couldn't have found out what I'd done. As far as they were concerned, I was just one more annoying employee on probation who skipped bail on the first night at work."

"I bet they're none too thrilled about that. I bet you've put them off ever taking on a casual employee without checking out references really carefully."

Avi gave a little whine to show remorse as it was a bit difficult hanging his head in shame over the phone.

"Well, we'll forgive you for now, if you in turn forgive us for not handing you the medal for wonderful police work."

"Deal," Avi grinned.

"Okay, now what do you have for us?"

Avi gave him the address. "But I have to tell you, I've done a cursory look-see of that place, and it doesn't look like the sort of place the Fox might be now."

"Leave that to the professionals," Colin said with more confidence than he felt.

The connection broken, he got up, heard some more crunching underfoot, and looked around for Leora.

"She's gone, sir," Potter said. "Something about having to go home for her Sabbath. Left everything neat and tidy and asked if she could come back tomorrow night."

Colin looked at his watch. Shabbos. It was almost Shabbos. The sun was sinking in the west, a light breeze was lifting the soft leaves, and he suddenly felt he wanted to go home. He struggled for a second, regained control.

"Come on, White. We have to visit this address. Abraham Pincus thinks the Fox might have been there or might still be there."

"If it's Orthodox Jews, though, they won't appreciate it if we barge in on their Sabbath preparations," Peter pointed out.

Colin felt the pull of the setting sun again, calling him from his past.

"Okay, let's leave it. I want to go home. I'm tired."

"Last Shabbos Josh was here with us," Ilana said to Leora after lighting the candles and sitting down with a siddur.

"Hardly seems possible that almost a week has gone by since he went missing," Leora replied with a sympathetic sigh.

"Having Josh around seems like a whole other life now," Ilana said, and began to cry. She had managed to hold herself in reasonably well until now, but the flood tide was coming and she could no longer stop it. Distressed, Leora sat down next to her on the sofa and held her while she sobbed on her shoulder, wetting the smart city suit she had put on for Shabbos.

"I'm sorry. I'm ruining your suit!"

Leora just patted her and made soothing noises until the storm had passed. When Ilana felt calm enough, she got up to splash some cold water on her face and dabbed it with tissues. When she returned, she looked much more composed. Without another word she opened her siddur and started to daven Kabbalas Shabbos and ma'ariv. Leora joined her, a little awkwardly because she was not yet completely comfortable with davening, and for a while the sitting room was quiet and peaceful. When Ilana closed her siddur and put it away, and Leora did the same, the two women sat down and looked at each other.

Ilana sighed. "I don't know how I am supposed to behave, Leora. I know you're not supposed to fret and be anxious on Shabbos, but how can I not?"

"I don't know how you can stop yourself worrying, Ilana. I know I probably couldn't. All I can say is, try to get as much spiritual input from Shabbos as you can and let it carry you over."

Ilana looked curiously at Leora. "If you don't mind me asking you something personal..."

Leora grinned and spread out her arms. "Feel free to probe. I'm an open book."

Ilana blushed. "Well, it's just that you don't seem to fit into any stereotypical pigeonhole of a Jewish woman. I know you are American and I am English, but I am married to an American and have been to the States lots of times, and you are not the typical American Orthodox Jew."

"I know. I'm an original. I guess some people would call people like me deprived. I was one of those latchkey kids whose parents barely knew we existed except to show us off as cute little accessories to their friends at dinner parties. Trophy kids. I was never read a bedtime story, never tucked in and kissed good night, and if I woke up screaming after a nightmare, or cried when I was sick or in pain, my parents would come in and yell at me for disturbing them, and didn't I know they had to go to work tomorrow?"

"How dreadful," Ilana said, thinking of Josh and the many times she had held him through night terrors, how she had comforted him through childhood illnesses, of the stories they had read together and talked about afterward.

"I'm painting it blacker than it was. Actually, since I didn't know any different, I thought that was how it had to be. I grew up tough and streetwise and very independent, so it wasn't all so bad. By the age of seven I knew how to order in a pizza, get myself across town on the subway, and call the cops if I thought an intruder was around. And I could sweet-talk myself into almost any place I wanted to be. By the age of fourteen there was only one place I wanted to be, and that was the police department. I hung around there the way other girls hung around the movies and pizza shops."

"It doesn't sound like much of a Jewish upbringing," Ilana commented, fascinated by all this.

"It was totally secular. My parents ate treif. Saturdays were for dinner parties or helicopter trips to the Hamptons to visit their wealthy friends in their fancy shorefront properties. The only way I knew I was Jewish was when I got called 'Jew-girl' at school. It wasn't even that offensive when the guys called me that. It was just a statement of fact, and I didn't feel threatened by it. I was popular and pretty, so my being Jewish didn't matter so much. It was just like being a redhead or having green eyes. Being a bit hard-nosed didn't harm my popularity either; I got a name as having leadership qualities. Well, there were some extremely softly reared American princes and princesses in that school, Jewish or otherwise, so anyone with a bit of oomph was automatically the leader."

"I'm one of those softly reared Jewish princesses," Ilana confessed.

Leora looked at her. "You aren't nearly as soft as you make yourself out to be."

"No? Look at me. I'm in pieces."
