Leadership with Koach HaTorah

Dayan Ehrentreu, shlita, is the inspiring force behind the Edgware Kollel. He spearheaded and actualised its formation over fifteen years ago. Kollel Beis Aharon has grown to be a bastion of Torah in the Edgware Kehillah. The Kollel has been influential in the transformation of Edgware, NW London and beyond.

Inspiring with Koach HaTorah

The Kollel Beis Hamedrash draws many members of the community to be inspired by the Koach HaTorah. The Kollel also takes part in Yemei Limmud for the wider community, sharing the Koach HaTorah further afield.

Many Avrechim, upon leaving the Kollel, go on to hold positions in Mosdos HaTorah across Edgware, NW London and beyond, as Rabbonim in communities, Marbitzei Torah in Kollelim and Yeshivos & teachers of Torah in numerous schools.

Growing with Koach HaTorah

Kollel Beis Aharon Edgware is a true Mokom Torah. The Kol Torah reverberates throughout the Beis Hamedrash throughout the day, and late into the evening hours. Torah comes to life within the walls of this building as the Avreichi HaKollel analyse, discuss, clarify and review the sugyos, allowing the Koach HaTorah to refine, elevate, inspire and penetrate their lives.

The confession

Colin didn't know what to believe. Recalling his childhood, when he was Orthodox, he didn't think that Shidduchim had elements of coercion, but it could be his memory playing tricks on him, a rosy-spectacled eye view of his own past, or maybe there were differences in culture between various groups. So he said nothing and waited for her to continue.

"I have never seen my parents like that. I had never been a difficult child. I'd always complied with my parents' wishes, always tried to be good. But this really frightened me. I did not want to find myself married to a stranger. For the first time in my life, I refused. My father's face turned dark red. I was afraid he would burst a blood vessel or have a heart attack. He looked at me and very deliberately said that if I didn't obey him things would be worse for me

"I looked at my mother, seeking some of the softness and comfort she had always displayed to me when I was younger. She stood there, stony-faced, looking the other way. That was the only comfort in that horrible situation, that she couldn't look me in the eye and do what she was doing to me."

Miriam sighed deeply.

"Go on," Colin said gently, deeply moved by this narrative. Peter and Wendy too, looked very disturbed and uncomfortable at what she was telling them.

Miriam stood up, then sat down again, took a sip of the cold tea, and wiped her teary eyes. "I wasn't used to defying my parents. I had no choice. It was arranged that we meet. I had no interest in it whatsoever, but my mother took me in hand. It was strange, now that I come to think of it, how she could dress me up but had no interest in glamour for herself. I never realized she knew how to apply makeup like a beautician. She primped and prepared me like a lamb to the slaughter. I decided the only way I could go through this was to become passive. She dressed me, made me up, did my hair, and led me to the meeting place.

"I remember the boy's parents briefly as they brought him to the meeting place. They had a stern, forbidding look, the look of people who had forgotten that life was there to be enjoyed. And it was the same look that my parents had recently superimposed onto their normal relaxed, friendly faces. I didn't understand how it could have gotten there.

"I stole a look at the boy. He was a younger version of his father, pale, stern, baleful. I looked into his dark eyes for some sign of humour or sense of fun and found none. My heart sank, trembling, into my fancy shoes.

"He said nothing to me at first, but allowed himself, and me, to be shunted out of the meeting place to 'go for a walk and get to know each other.' I had barely noticed where the meeting place had been, but outside, I found myself on the banks of a river or canal I didn't recognize, far from familiar neighbourhoods. There was a narrow towpath along the bank, and it was here that this stranger led me."

Miriam stopped again and asked if she might have a fresh cup of black tea. Wendy hurried to get it, eager not to miss the next instalment. She returned and Miriam thanked her, then took a sip before continuing.

"We said nothing to each other at first. I kept stealing glances at him and he at me. He seemed to sum up everything I disliked; his paleness, his unhealthy looking complexion that spoke of too much time spent indoors, the only fire coming from his glowing dark eyes. After about fifteen minutes, he turned off the towpath abruptly and I followed him across a public footpath through some muddy fields.

"You remember how much it rained back in October? I was wearing delicate, pretty shoes and they were not designed for this kind of terrain. If I had known where we were going, I'd have worn boots, not that I had any active input into what I was dressed in; it was as if my mother was dressing a Barbie doll. My shoes were getting sodden; my feet were becoming wet and cold. I was also getting tired and voiced my complaints. He shot me a harsh look of disapproval, as if I was some kind of wimp. But I don't have much stamina and..." she paused and looked down, running her finger along the rim of her Styrofoam cup. "Well, the truth is, I'm recovering from anorexia...I...I stopped eating when my parents started going weird on me. I had felt so helpless then; it was the only way I could have control over something in my life. I've been seeing someone about it, and she's helped me a lot. But as you can see, I'm still very weak and thin. Anyone could see that. But this guy, he didn't even seem to notice."

"I felt this was not a good sign, him being so unsympathetic and insensitive. That was another thing to add to my lengthening list of bad signs I had about this boy. Then, as if by magic, in the middle of nowhere, a bench materialized. It was one of those that have a brass plaque on it, dedicating it to someone who had died. I can only presume that whoever had dedicated this bench lived nearby. Who else would put a bench in that lonely spot? Talking of lonely spots, I also became concerned that it was not proper, us being there on our own."

She looked at the three of them, and Colin knew she had no idea that he was probably more cognizant of the laws of yichud than she. Now that he was an engaged man, he had particular reason to know those laws, and Leora always made sure that in their times alone together, those rules were never breached.

"Thankfully, he sat down. I was worried he was just going to trudge on and ignore the bench, but it was almost as if he knew it was there all along and this was his signal to stop walking. I sank onto the bench, and I must admit, I was trembling with exhaustion.

"I presume you've been briefed as to your role as my wife," he began without preamble, "so there is little point in going over it again."

"I beg your pardon?" I said. I don't mind admitting, I was shocked out of my mind. I had foolishly imagined him to be as disillusioned with me as I was with him.

"Your role as my wife. What I shall expect to be done, and how and where and when."

"Who says I want to be your wife?" I said. I was outraged, I don't mind telling you!

"It's decided. This walk is just to finalise things and so I can get a look at you. I am satisfied that you fulfil my requirements."

"I stood up, ignoring the wet squelching sound from inside my shoes.

"Well you don't fulfil mine!" I said in a loud voice, my hands on my hips. "And no one has briefed me about anything. They just told me someone had been picked out for me. What is this? Have I gone back in a time machine without knowing it and this is some barbaric civilization where women are sold into slavery on marriage? I shall marry whom I choose, and when I choose. End of."
