TO BE CONT. NEXT WEEK IY"H

DARK TAPESTRY

by Ruthie Pearlman

"There's something here. I need to increase the magnification. Give me a sec..." She twisted some knobs and the image on the screen grew blurry. She focused it, and sharpened yet again the soil sample took on a very different aspect, with each particle filling the screen. Between the huge boulder-like particles of soil were round balls with spikes coming out of them, pale yellow or green in color.

"They look like mines, the old-fashioned kind with spikes coming out of them from all directions," Colin said with a grin. "What on earth are they?"

"These, believe it or not, are pollen spores. And they might help us place the abductor both in time and location even more accurately than the soil. Forensic palynology is a new science and obviously only useful at certain times of the year."

"Spring and early summer," Colin said.

"Yup. Right now."

"I've never heard of that study. How does it work?"

"It is the science of using both modern and fossil palynomorphs, primarily spores and pollen. It's not precisely known where and when it was first used, but the early 1950s is probably a good guess. The first well-documented case was in Austria in 1959 involving a criminal case where a man traveling down the Danube River disappeared near Vienna. His body was never found. A suspect, with a known motive for killing him, was later arrested and charged with the man's murder. With no body or confession, the case was in jeopardy of default. The only real clue seemed to be a locally uncharacteristic mud found on the defendant's shoes. Identification of the palynomorphs within the mud consisted of tree pollen — spruce, willow, and alder — as well as an extinct fossil, hickory pollen. Only one small area along the Danube Valley had soils with the precise modern pollens in association with the rocks containing the fossil pollen. When confronted with this information, the defendant confessed and showed authorities precisely where he had buried the body."

"Interesting," said Colin, feeling even more inadequate in the face of this paragon.

"I must confess I haven't studied forensic palynology at any great depth," Leora said.

"But I have done some study days on it, and I'll try to remember what we learned and what to look for. I'm not a botanist, but I do know how to compare. This is the soil sample taken from the windowsill, not the garden. Let's get the one from the Hardman garden back up."

With the garden sample in and magnification increased, Leora drew in a sharp breath as she focused on something between the boulders.

"I may not be a botanist," she hissed, "but this does not look like the same kind of pollen as the one from the windowsill. I'll try to zoom in on just one of those spores." She twisted the knobs on the polarized light microscope. "C'mon, zoom in close for me... Yes! It is a totally different spore. I suggest we try your playhouse land and see what kind of spores we can pick up there."

"All right," Colin said, stunned by what he was seeing on the screen.

"C'mon then! Let's go! I have to get back in time for sunset."

She covered the microscopes and put the samples away safely. Sommers and White were waiting for her in the unmarked squad car, and she hopped in the back. While Colin sat, brooding, Leora looked around the unfamiliar streets of Golders Green with interest, exclaiming at the narrow roads and small cars.

"The boys are in school now," Colin said at last, "although they do finish early, it being Friday. But I know where the playhouse is. It's behind the Mendelsohn place. Between it and the house next door. The kid showed me a sort of secret passageway."

"Great. Let's find it," Leora said with a grin. Colin couldn't help but admire her enthusiasm and good humor, despite the fact that she was obviously jet-lagged and exhausted. He knew himself well enough to be aware how difficult he became when he was overtired. Lucy had told him often enough.

They reached the Mendelsohn house and parked.

"Do you think the kid might actually be here?" Peter asked.

"Don't know. Let's go see. And be quiet, White. Your great clodhoppers make far too much noise. Get them rubber-soled."

"Yes, boss," White said with a mock pout.

The three of them padded as silently as they knew how along the street as Colin looked furtively for the secret passageway.

"I feel a bit like the Pink Panther," Peter whispered, "and more than slightly ridiculous."

"Shh. Ah, here it is. Come on, down here," hissed Colin, and they all crept down the passage in tandem, all three of them making humorous Pink Panther movements and trying very hard not to crack up.

Leora brought up the rear of the trio, and as she walked, she picked up samples of the flora and bagged them. The passageway opened into the triangle of ground that held the playhouse.

The three stood there for a moment, looking at it. Leora took out her Leica and took several photographs in quick succession. There was no immediate evidence of anyone being in residence. They inched forward in case anyone was hiding, then the two men stormed the playhouse, one on each side, peering through the windows.

"No one home," Colin called out.

"Don't touch anything," Leora ordered, slipping on some latex gloves and taking out some tweezers. Squatting carefully, she manipulated her slender body through the narrow frame of the doorway and into the playhouse without sitting or touching the walls. She shot off several pictures with her Leica, then handed it carefully out through the window to Colin and started a vocal inventory as she bagged items.

"Paper cups, four, used. Traces of unknown liquids in the bottom." She handed the bags through the window, one bag for each cup.

"Plastic teaspoons, three, stained. Candy-bar wrappers, six, various." Again, each in a separate bag. "Used tissues. I'll bag these together, Colin." She looked around. "Okay, that's the obvious bits. Now the trace. Footwear."
