DARK TAPESTRY

by Ruthie Pearlman

"Footwear?" Colin repeated, feeling stupid. Leora switched to her explaining scientific stuff to the uninitiated voice. "Since criminals must enter and exit crime scene areas it should, therefore, be reasonably assumed that they may leave traces of their footwear. Criminals have become smarter and wiser. They wear protection over their hands to avoid leaving fingerprints and masks over their faces to avoid eyewitness identification. However, they make little attempt to conceal footwear. It's common to see an individual wearing gloves, but people don't normally protect their shoes."

"How on earth can you pick up anything in here?"

"First," Leora said, "we darken the area as much as possible. I'll get out in a minute. It will make it easier to see." She bagged a few more items with tweezers, then carefully eased herself out of the playhouse. Colin noticed she tried to place her feet in the same prints as her incoming steps had made. Once outside, she did a three-hundred-sixty-degree swivel, placed her feet carefully apart, and took from her backpack a large black cloth, which she slung over the top of the playhouse, obscuring the windows. Then, again without moving from her stance, she took out something from her backpack.

"At a time like this she gets her hair drier out," grumbled Colin. "Typical woman."

"The Polyray is a tunable, hand-held light source designed specifically for forensic crime scene investigation," Leora said. "But the crime scene needs to be dark first. It's a portable version of a forensic light source, which would be too big for me to carry around." She switched it on and directed it through one of the windows, having first thrown the blackout cloth over her head so she was underneath.

"Can I peek?" Colin asked curiously.

"Uh, yeah, but try not to make too many new footprints. Just use the ones you already used." Colin obligingly stepped in his own footprints until he reached another window, threw the blackout cloth over his head, and peered in. Leora was struggling to get the light at a low angle. Eventually she moved to the door of the playhouse and shone it from there, over the dark floor.

"Look at that," she whispered. "Lights up like those illuminated walkways on airplanes. Those are my footprints, but there are at least two others. And one, I would guess, is definitely a kid's."

Colin coughed. "Only one is a kid's? You sure?"

"Why?"

"Mikey Mendelsohn's been in here. He's in Josh's class. He's been my chief investigator."

"Oh, I see," Leora said, crestfallen. "Well, one kid at least and one adult at least. I'll have to photograph and analyze these a bit more to see if there are any more than that."

Colin peered and waited, then let Peter have a go at peering and waiting, while Leora painstakingly shone the light at a low angle across the floor of the playhouse, turning what had looked like a boring brown wooden floor into a fluorescent light show of patterns and textures.

"What does that forensic light source show up besides footprints?" asked Pete.

"Mostly blood, urea, saliva, powdered and DFO-treated fingerprints, and ninhydrin-treated prints. Stuff like that."

"Oh, right," Peter said.

DFO-treated fingerprints, and ninhydrin-treated prints. Stuff like that.”

“Oh, right,” Peter said.

Leora took several photographs. “Shame there’s nothing to take a raised impression from,” she sighed. “But I think I’ll have something to work on with these.” She got up gracefully and took the blackout cloth from on top of the playhouse, folded it neatly, and put it back in her backpack.

“So do you think they were here?” Colin asked.

“Well, somebody was here, that’s for sure,” Leora replied. She looked at her watch. “I think if I can get access to a darkroom now and get back to the station to compare these samples, that will be enough. It’s after two o’clock. Maybe I can get something to eat? Ilana said there was a kosher grocery near the station.”

“Yes, of course. You can pick up a sandwich or a danish.”

“And the darkroom?” Leora asked as they got into the car.

“There is one at the station. We keep it for just such a purpose. It’s small but you are welcome to use it.”

“Great!”

Back at the station, the three walked in to find an agitated desk clerk. “You turned your mobile off,” he accused.

“Did I?” Colin replied, unruffled.

“I’ve been trying to call you ever since you left the station. Your mobile is definitely switched off!”

Colin pulled his phone out of his pocket, looked at it, pressed a few buttons. “Bother. It’s not switched off. It’s dead.”

“Don’t you ever recharge it?” Peter snorted derisively.

“I do recharge it. Every single night before I go to bed I put it in the charger...” Colin stopped and thought. Last night was a total blur, but he vaguely remembered being so exhausted that his usual pre-bed ritual had gone right out the window to be replaced by an all-encompassing collapse and oblivion.

“Flip,” he said, stopping.

“Yeah, flip,” Potter said.

“Sorry. Last night...well. What did you want?”

Colin asked, looking suitably chastised. Keeping the lines of communication open was one of the basics of police work.

“Someone called Abraham Pincus has been ringing and ringing. Said he had some news relevant to the Hardman case.”

“Oh. The supergeek. I wonder what he’s been up to. Where was he ringing from? Somewhere nice and far away, I trust?”

“Local call,” Potter said.

“Uh-oh. He’s in England, is he? I thought that pesky Baruch Weiss said he lived in Israel or Australia.”

Colin suddenly got even more worried about what Baruch had been up to behind his back. He hated it when Joe Public got up to all kinds of crime-solving messes and took the law into his own hands. Joe Public should be sitting nicely and quietly at home, waiting for people like he, Detective Inspector Colin Sommers, to solve crimes for them.

“He’s left a number. Said it was urgent.” Potter pushed a piece of paper across the desk. He assumed the bored expression he had been practicing whenever Colin started on the “pesky Baruch Weiss” tack, which was beginning to get rather tedious.
