Naming a baby is said to include an element of prophecy, which forms the child's spiritual destiny. Tragically, we were only able to name our baby after his passing, unable to help shape this destiny. Avidan, meaning that 'Hashem has judged', reflected our acceptance of his fate and our resolve to have faith.

Whether we experience pure joy or intense sorrow, throughout it all Hashem is with us every step of the way. He asks us to look beyond the pain, and to learn and grow from it - because life is a journey and Hashem has a masterplan.

And as we did this, we started to realize that Avidan did fulfil his destiny in life - he taught us that Hashem is just and therefore 'Lo Ira', I will not fear, 'Ki Hashem Li', because Hashem is always with me. From the depths of my soul to each and every one of yours, may this song help us to realise that Hashem's greatness pervades every moment. We may be happy or we may be sad, but our Father is always just.

Kieran Trillick

All proceeds from the single will be donated to Avidan's mission fund.

"IP?"

"Internet protocol. It's dynamite. It means we can at least find out which provider..."

"The Fox uses!" said Baruch, clapping his hands. "Yes!"

"Or used. How do we know it wasn't just to send the e-mail and then he changed accounts?"

"It's possible," Avi agreed, "but, I'm willing to bet, unlikely. If our foxy friend went to all the trouble of making his e-mail untraceable, what would be the point for him of changing ISPs? He is arrogant. Thinks himself invincible. This is when mistakes are made." Avi tapped the screen. "Like this." He looked up at his host. "I am going to go on-line with this to do a DNS lookup on this IP. That will tell us who the Internet provider is."

Within seconds he was on-line again, and Avi switched to black-screened DOS mode, typing rapidly. The black screen suddenly filled with data.

"I just did a DNS lookup on the IP, and it's come back with a reply. This is SmallNet."

"SmallNet? You're kidding me. There is an Internet service provider called SmallNet?"

"I think they pride themselves on the 'we are small and the service is personal' angle. The bigger providers do get a bit impersonal. On the other hand, the small ones don't have the resources."

He brought up a Web browser and looked for the Web site of SmallNet. Their site was, predictably, Avi thought, alive with dizzying animations, all recognizable from free download sites. Even the company logo was made up of individually rotating letters in glaring, three-dimensional gold. Avi winced. He clicked on one of the links and was rewarded with another animated page, this time showing a construction worker with the message "This page is under construction. Come back later."

"Bit dazzling, isn't it?" commented Baruch, pretending to shield his eyes from the glare.

"It's deserving of the Appalling Web Site of the Year Award," Avi said with conviction. "Look. It has far too many animations, none of which are original. It is extremely hard to find your way around, and when you do click on something, it gives you an 'under construction' animation. There is very little useful information on the site. Basically it's a waste of space. And it's exactly how I would have expected SmallNet's site to look." He clicked on a few more links, some of which led nowhere, some more of which were under construction, but finally hit pay dirt. A page with their "snail mail" address, or postal address details, and phone and fax numbers.

As the computer wasn't connected to a printer, Avi scribbled down the details and logged off. "This place is not too far I think. I can get there in less than an hour." He looked at Baruch and grinned. "If somebody takes me, that is. Or lends me a car."

"My second car is insured for all drivers," Baruch said thoughtfully, "and to be honest, I don't think I would be of any help. Besides, I do have to get back to work. Do you actually need a second person there or is it just a driver?"

Avi thought. "I'd rather do this on my own. I can think more clearly. So if it's okay with you, I'll take you up on that offer of the car with thanks, Baruch."

"Sure, I'll go get the keys. Do you have a cellular phone? I'd appreciate being kept in touch."

"No. My Israeli one doesn't work here."

"Okay, I'll lend you mine. But then, how will you keep in touch with me?"

"I'll phone you at home or in the office," Avi promised Baruch.

"You'd better! And look after the phone with your life!"

Avi grinned and hugged it to his chest. "I will. Is it charged?"

"Fully. Should last at least a day on standby and a couple of hours talk."

Keys and phone in possession, Avi left in a small blue Ford, street map on the passenger seat.

Baruch stood looking after him. "I wish I was going along," he said aloud. "I'd love to see what he intends to do."

Chapter Fourteen

The address in Edgware was a small detached house on a green leafy street, quite different from the rundown estate they had just left.

"She's come up in the world," White remarked.

"If she's still living here. Come on, let's investigate."

They walked up the neatly groomed front path bordered with flowerbeds on both sides and a small lawn beyond. Colin rang the bell, and they heard it echo inside the house.

"At least no dog this time," Peter remarked.

They waited a good while, rang again a couple of times, more insistently. Someone had to be home. There was a small car in the driveway, and the house was too far from the local shops to be easily walkable. Colin kept his finger pressed on the bell for a good minute.

"Do you mind?" came a haughty feminine voice. A thirty-something elegant woman wearing gardening gloves and an annoyed expression came around the side of the house. In her hand was a small earthy trowel. "You don't have to ring my doorbell like a total maniac," the woman said crossly. "I was in the garden, as you can see." Colin flipped open his ID. "Can we talk, please, madam?"

The woman took the ID and examined it carefully, then handed it back. "Detective Inspector," she acknowledged.

"And this is Sergeant White," Colin introduced his partner, and the lady nodded to Peter.

"Your name please, madam?"

"It's Karen Whitestone. Mrs. Karen Whitestone." Colin felt a stab of disappointment that her surname wasn't Wallis.

"You'd better come round the back. There's a garden table and chairs, and I'll bring out some cool drinks." Her voice had undergone the usual alteration from haughty to respectful. Colin and Peter grinned at each other behind her back as they followed her to the garden.

"This is very nice," Colin commented. And it was. The garden was beautifully tended and lush with spring and early summer flora. Under a bright umbrella was a white table and chairs set on a small patio.

"Sit down, gentlemen. I'll be right out with some drinks."

They sat in the shade, caressed by the warm breezes, and looked around the garden.

"I could get used to this," Colin said, stretching out his long legs.

"This is the life," agreed Peter.

The woman came out presently bearing a tray of cool sodas clinking with ice cubes.

"A gorgeous day, isn't it?" she asked the two men.

"Thank you. Yes, it is lovely. Been a while since I've been able to enjoy it," replied Colin.

"Oh?" she inquired, taking a tall glass and sitting next to them. "Why is that? Busy on an exciting case? A murder, maybe?"

"I sincerely hope not," Colin said. The tone of his voice dispelled any mockery in her voice.
