Independent Health Insurance Specialists

Client Testimonial

"My experience with Lifepoint Healthcare was out of this world. For quite a few years I have been trying to lower my healthcare premiums.

Whatever I tried didn't work. If I did get a cheaper policy, there were always technical stipulations or there would be exclusions etc.

I turned to Lifepoint & somehow they negotiated with my present provider a deal that landed me paying almost half of what I was paying.

It was mind-blowing.

Exactly the same policy but half the price.

I am so grateful & happy."

DARK TAPESTRY

by Ruthie Pearlman

Chapter Thirteen

"Yeah? You think you have a way to trace the Fox?"

"If it was just tracing him through the Internet, I could have stayed where I was. But we have to find him physically. That's why I am here."

"So," continued Avi as Baruch pulled out into the busy traffic on the M4 motorway toward London, "what else is being done to catch the Fox? You can't all just be relying on me."

"No, I don't even think the police know you are here, to be honest. In my opinion, they are being incredibly devil-may-care about this whole business. Here I am with my troop of ready-to-go searchers, just waiting for authorization, and the cops keep putting me off."

"Searchers?"

"Yes. Do you remember the time I got a band of guys together and we searched for that teenage girl in Stamford Hill and found her with an Indian family?"

Avi frowned. "Yes, vaguely," Baruch shot him a disapproving glance. He expected his moment of glory to be indelibly etched on everyone's brain, and it seemed instead, that everyone had forgotten.

"Well," Baruch went on, trying to stifle his disappointment, "I thought we could do something similar here. But the cops seem to be messing about over the authorization."

"Hmm," Avi said, and after a moment added, "Maybe they aren't messing about. Maybe they're stalling because they don't think it's a good idea for you to go blundering about."

"Blundering about? Me?" Baruch suddenly felt annoyed. He had been hoping for unconditional support, and Avi seemed to be taking the opposition stance.

"I don't mean to offend, but I don't think this case is the same at all as the one of the recalcitrant teenager who hid herself away in a family of Muslims to try out an alien culture and religion. From the little I know of the Fox, he is extremely intelligent and resourceful. What his motives are I cannot imagine, but the last thing we want to do is flush him out of his lair and drive him further afield where he will be much harder to catch. And a fox who knows that the hounds are on his tail will flee. You and your troop of searchers, however well intentioned, are little more than a pack of baying hounds snapping at his heels, sending him streaking across the fields and out of our reach. A much more sophisticated and devious approach must be made if we are to catch this fox."

Baruch retreated into offended silence at this. After a few moments, Avi said lightly, "Hey, friend! Don't be broiges with me, please. I'm gonna need all the help I can get, and I need you on my side."

Baruch shot him a slightly mollified look. "You do? What can I, poor, blundering, useless I, do to help?"

"Do you have a computer with the Internet?"

"My kids have a PC at home for work and play, but we don't have the Internet."

"No worries. I brought a modem and some software with me just in case. I'll configure the modem to your PC and load the software. Then I can connect to my e-mail account and we're in business."

"Do whatever you have to do," Baruch said.

Colin and Peter went to the address given as Cindy Wallis's. It was an apartment in a low-rise estate, where the original developers had obviously attempted to landscape pleasant surroundings. Grassy borders, flowerbeds, and small trees had been planted and were now strewn with litter and Coke cans.

"Shame, innit," White remarked, kicking a pile of old newspapers out of the way to access the main entrance. "I bet this place was the pride of the neighborhood when it was new."

The inner courtyard, from where several blue-painted front doors opened, was cemented over, and more litter blew around in the breeze. It smelled of unpleasant things, and both policemen wrinkled their noses.

"Poo," said White expressively.

"Disgusting place," agreed Colin. They rang the bell at number 18. A loud barking immediately could be heard from inside, reminiscent of a large Rottweiler. The two cops exchanged glances.

"Gulp," said Peter.

They were just about ready to change their minds and leave when the door opened and a harmless-looking little old woman peered out. The frenzied barking continued in the background.

"Madam, we have called about a..."

"EH?" yelled the old woman.

"I SAID, WE HAVE COME ABOUT..." But it was hopeless over the terrible din.

"Just a minute," she said, and she disappeared into the bowels of the house. Seconds later, the barking stopped abruptly. Smiling, the old woman returned to the door. "You was saying?"

The two policemen stared at her, astonished. "How did you stop the dog from barking?" Colin couldn't help but ask.

"Come inside. I'll show you." She shuffled off inside the house again. Bemused the men followed her, looking anxiously left and right for the huge dog that was the source of all the racket. The old woman went straight toward a small box, a tiny red light glowing from it, on the hall table.

"Here's your dog," she said. To illustrate, she threw a small switch, and immediately a deafening and aggressive barking filled the house. She switched it off, and blessed silence reigned.

"It helps protect an old woman who lives alone," she explained with a toothless smile.

"That'd scare off the most persistent burglar or mugger, that would," White agreed.

"You are policemen, aren't you? I guessed at once."

"How? We're not in uniform."

She gave them a shrewd look. "You have the look. Unmissable. Come in and have a cuppa tea. At least with two coppers in the house, I feel safe."

The two men grinned and followed her into a dingy living room attached to an even dingier kitchen. "Sit down, sit down. I'll put the kettle on. Won't be a minute."

The old woman didn't have an electric kettle, only an old whistling one she set on the gas stove, while she bustled around with old blue-striped pottery cups and saucers and a packet of chocolate digestive biscuits. "Me favorite," she said, bringing it all to the table. Sugar was dispensed from a dirty and encrusted blue-striped sugar bowl with a grimy chrome teaspoon.

"Now," she said when they were all sipping at the strong hot tea, surprisingly good tea despite the lack of hygiene in its preparation, "if you've come about me TV license, I'll pay it in stamps. I promise I will."

Colin raised his hand in dismissal. "We haven't come about your TV license. We're looking for someone. Cindy Wallis. Apparently she lives here."

"Nah. Doesn't."

The old woman took another digestive biscuit as if the subject was closed.

"Did she ever? How long have you been here?"

"I been here going on three years. Before that I was in a home, but the money ran out."
