Restoring Your Body's Natural Balance

About reflexology

Reflexology is a form of alternative medicine that supports our body in self-healing, by tapping into its natural healing powers. Our feet are an intricate map of our bodies, and through massage and the application of gentle pressure in specific areas of the foot, we stimulate healing, bringing balance and rejuvenation to our body

Who benefits from a reflexology treatment?

Reflexology is suitable at all ages and stages. Whether baby, child or adult, reflexology supports the recovery of ailments, boosting the immune system, which in turn may prevent recurring infections. Amongst many other benefits, it also improves blood circulation, reduces fatigue and improves metabolism and digestive issues.

Reflexology throughout your pregnancy

As a non-invasive yet alternative method, reflexology is the perfect way to ease pregnancy symptoms and ailments. From back pain, constipation, lack of sleep to preparing your body for labour, reflexology will support you through it all.

What to expect in a reflexology treatment?

A 40-minute treatment includes assessing your current health situation, massaging and working on pressure points on the feet, as you relax in a reclining position. The treatment will leave you feeling relaxed, energised and back in balance.

DARK TAPESTRY

by Ruthie Pearlman

CHAPTER NINETEEN cont.

"Not your fault. You've been most helpful," he assured her. "I'm just voicing my frustration at not being able to trace her. Please, Mrs. Whitestone, if you hear anything, anything at all..."

"I'll phone you at once, don't worry."

Colin disconnected and muttered something under his breath.

"Back to the station, please," Leora said. "I want to examine the evidence I took from that house and garden."

"Might as well," Peter sighed. "We seem to have hit bedrock in this case, and there's nowhere else to dig."

Avi brought down his small suitcase. Baruch and Malka were battling with their children; not all of them had school on Sundays.

"Oh, are you leaving?" Malka said with genuine disappointment.

"I have a wife and family of my own," Avi said, "and I think my task here is complete. I managed to find an address from which the Fox was sending mail. It could be useless, or it could be a trail that would lead to finding him. If the Fox sends any more e-mails, phone me — don't forward them by e-mail — and we'll arrange a time you can fax them to me. I want to see every word this clown has to say."

"I still think we should do a search," Baruch said. "I'm convinced we'll find him hiding out in our neighborhood. Probably right under our noses, only we can't see it right now. That girl was hiding with a Muslim family right in the middle —"

Malka sighed loudly. "Your moment of glory has been and gone, Baruch, my dear."

"This case is completely different," Avi reinforced.

"The Fox would only be right under our noses if he was pretty sure he was untraceable there. As soon as search parties started beating the bushes, as it were, he'd be off like a shot. I just spoke to the police. At least my theories were partly correct. The Fox was in that house I traced him to, only he didn't stay long enough to be found. There was a computer in that house. He took it with him, I suspect. Where he is now is anyone's guess. Maybe he even fled the country with Josh."

"Fled the country? Oh, no! How will they ever find him?" Malka cried, distressed.

"I did put that suggestion to D.I. Sommers, and he assured me that he had alerted the proper authorities at all points of entry and exit from the country to be on the lookout. But, as we all know, someone who is determined enough can slip past most checkpoints. However, I must say one thing."

"What?" asked Baruch, clutching at straws.

"The Fox seems bent on revenge for something we don't know about yet. He wants to torture the Hardmans, dangling their son just out of their grasp. It wouldn't make much sense if he disappeared totally. He needs to be where he can torment them the best. That's just my theory, anyhow. It's one I am clinging to, because the alternative is just too dreadful to contemplate."

"Yes," Baruch said quietly. "And if he is close by, at least we have a chance."

Avi nodded and looked at his watch. "I should go to the airport now."

"I'll drive you."

"No, it's okay. I can go by tube. Thanks anyhow. I'll keep in touch. Oh, listen. I decided to leave that external modem on your computer, so it's all set up to receive and send e-mails. I know of a good provider you can sign up with if you want. You can get the first month free. I hope by the time that runs out, Josh will be found. I know you've decided to send and receive all mail through Don Hardman's PC, but I don't think that's a good idea. Only makes the Fox's job easier; he would not have been able to monitor e-mails if they were coming from any which way. It will be easier for me to communicate directly with you by e-mail than through Don's machine all the time. You can pay me back for the modem any time."

"Thanks," Baruch said. A short pause, then, in a panicked tone, "But I have no idea how to work e-mail."

Avi smiled. "Get that ten-year-old son of yours to show you how."

The two men shook hands. Avi thanked Malka for her hospitality and left.

Leora ran the tests on the new forensic evidence. Even while they waited, they knew what the tests would show. This time they were sure. Before it was mere wishful thinking that made them sure the Fox had been at the playhouse. When the results of those tests had come back negative, though Colin had been bitterly disappointed, he hadn't been unduly surprised. It had all seemed too predictable, too expected. It would have been too easy to trace the Fox if he had used the playhouse. He was too clever for that.

"Results positive," Leora said. "The samples match. The Fox has definitely been in the Segals' house. The soil samples match, the carpet samples match fibers taken from the windowsill, and the forensic palynology matches, too."

She sat down, looking at the two policemen. "Does it help us, though?" she asked. "What about those addresses Mr. Smoothy from the real estate agency gave us?"

"I've had them checked out. As expected, none of them exist. All invented addresses. Blind alley." "Sheesh," Leora said, throwing up her hands.

"You know what I think?" Peter said after a minute's frustrated silence.

Colin said, "Okay, I'll take the bait. Tell me what you think."

"I think," Peter replied, "that if the Fox has fled his lair, there may be no harm at all in allowing Mr. Weiss to do that search."

They both looked at him.

"Peter," Leora said at last, "I think your reason has finally departed. If the Fox has fled his lair, a search of Golders Green will be fruitless. If he hasn't fled, a search will flush him out and scare him off. Either way, I can't see the point."

"Well, think of something better to do now. Anything is better than doing nothing," Peter said sulkily, seeing that Colin agreed with Leora. "Sometimes doing nothing is the best option," Colin said. "If you just sit tight and wait it out, things happen."

There was a pause where all three were still. Statues. Frozen moments in time.

"You mean," Peter said slowly, enunciating each syllable, "that you are putting this case on the back burner?"

"Not exactly putting it on the back burner," Colin said uncomfortably. "More like sitting back and waiting to see what happens next."

There was another incredulous pause.

"There's a kid's life at stake!" Peter, the only parent among them, burst out. "You can't just sit tight! And just imagine what Mrs. Hardman would say if she knew the police had given up on her son."

He walked to the door, opened it, and turned around.

"Who is going to be the one to tell the Hardmans?" He glared at Colin. "You? Are you going to tell them we don't have any more ideas?"
