DARK TAPESTRY

by Ruthie Pearlman

Her parents were distraught at first by what they thought of as their daughter's defection, but she kept a close bond with them, so they were soon reassured that they were not to be cast off along with her previous lifestyle. Living with them was another matter. She took an apartment of her own in Flatbush, though it meant commuting to work. She chose not to take a roommate as she couldn't have borne sharing with giggly young women. When she visited her parents, the occasions were often still and unnatural. She would sit at their highly polished elegant dining-room table, eating her own food and using plastic cutlery on a plastic mat, chatting about her work and carefully avoiding talking about her personal life. Lesser mortals than Leora would have slowly cut down on these painful visits, but she kept on going.

She reached a newsstand and picked up a copy of the New York Times. With it tucked under her arm she arrived at her small apartment and let herself in.

Leora went to the refrigerator, opened the door, and peered in. She found a bowl of withered salad, a packet of cheese slices, two tomatoes, and a quart of milk. Three eggs. A stick of butter. She sighed and opened the freezer compartment. A loaf of sliced bread and some vegetarian sausages. Do I call for takeout or make something out of this? she thought. She weighed the options. If I make a meal out of this, then I have to go grocery shopping tomorrow. If I call for takeout, then I can save this food. On the other hand, this food needs to be used up and I should go grocery shopping...

Sighing, she took three slices of the bread and put them into the toaster. Then she took two eggs and the butter and some milk and made herself scrambled eggs with one of the tomatoes. Piling the mixture on top of the buttered toast, she took her simple meal to the kitchen table, washed her hands, and sat down with a cup of coffee and the Times.

She ate, reading her newspaper contentedly and sipping coffee, until the phone rang. It was a call from London.

Colin Sommers sat at his desk, head in hands, polystyrene cup of coffee at his side. He looked at his watch. Ten-thirty. He needed sleep. It was nearly the end of the fourth day, he was no nearer finding Josh, and his whole body was screaming for rest. He lay his head down on the desk for just a moment. Just a moment.

A hand shaking his shoulder awakened him. Groggily he shook it off. "What is it?" "Sir, it's Potter. You have a call. From America." "Tell them to go away." Colin's mind sought sleep desperately.

"She says she'll only take a minute. She says she's a criminologist."

The fog cleared in Colin's head as if someone had blown some icy air through his ears. "Criminologist? Gimme, gimme."

Potter grinned, went back to his desk, and put the call through.

"Hi. I'm Leora Jakober." The strong New York accent made Colin wince. "I'm a criminologist attached to NYPD. I also happen to be Jewish.

A special request has been received through department channels that my services might be needed to help you with the case of Josh Hardman."

"Have I just died and gone to heaven?" Colin sighed blissfully.

"'Scuse me?"

"Don't mind me. I'm talking to myself. You're a criminologist with the NYPD."

"That's what I just said."

"I could certainly use some help. We seem to have ground to a halt. We have some trace evidence, but I'm sure there is more that we are missing."

"That's what I do," Leora said. "How long has the kid been missing?"

"This is the end of day four. We are frankly very concerned for the lad's safety."

"If you want me, I can be on the next plane. I just finished a case here in New York, and I have some time off due to me. The source who requested me has assured me that my expenses would be paid."

"I'd have to okay it with my superiors, of course. They may not be willing to allow an outsider to come in on a British case. But if you give me the number of your superiors, I'll call them for confirmation, and then get back to you."

He passed on the information and numbers to his superiors and sat back to wait. Drinking a cup of coffee, he thought about the phone call from Leora Jakober. Colin wasn't a fool and quickly made the connection between the American Don Hardman and the NYPD. It was pretty obvious to him who had requested that she join the investigative team.

Who cares who requested her? If she brings results, who cares?

Within twenty minutes his super was on the line, having made the call to the NYPD.

"Well, Colin, lad, it's most irregular, of course, but since her ladyship is being bought and paid for by person or persons unknown, and she has a reputation any one of us here would envy, it would be churlish of us to refuse, really, wouldn't it. No point in cutting off our noses to spite our faces, and if she produces no results, well, we haven't lost any money, have we?"

"No, sir," Colin said, then added curiously, "So the NYPD are impressed by her, are they?"

"They certainly put on a good show of reluctance to let her go, but since she has just finished a case and has some holiday time owing, they could hardly say no. They said she was the best criminologist they've ever had, and could we please hurry up and solve the case so they could have her back. She'll be on a flight arriving tomorrow evening."

Colin grinned. "Well, as you say, sir, we can't lose if someone else is paying. Worse comes to worse, she's useless and we jettison her ASAP."

Just knowing she was on her way made Colin feel better about the whole thing. He made a note to phone the Hardmans in the morning and inform them about the new development, left himself instructions on a yellow message slip to go and talk to Don Hardman's employees, and went home. After a quick shower, he fell into the first real sleep he had enjoyed since Josh went missing.
