A bottle of Bartenura Sparkling Moscato Rosé stands next to two glasses filled with sparkling wine. The bottle has a dark body and a rose-gold foil-wrapped neck. The label is ornate with silver scrollwork and features the text 'Sparkling Moscato', 'BARTENURA', and 'ROSÉ'. The glasses are tall and slender, filled with a bubbly rose-colored liquid. A cork lies on the surface in front of the glasses. The background is dark with several other bottles of the same wine visible but out of focus. On the right side, there is a decorative, stylized floral or leaf pattern.

Spice Of Life Retreat

An oasis in time and place, the spice of life retreat was a rejuvenating and revitalising mind and body experience. I find that even now, months later I draw nourishment from all the different aspects of it, including the wisdom from the classes and memories of the enriching physical and spiritual moments - Chavi

Without hesitation, I can say that retreat has changed my life, eradicated symptoms of a chronic health condition and helped me on my journey to become a healthier, happier and more fulfilled person. - Rachel

The house was cosy and bright, surrounded by beautiful grounds and sea views, the food held an explosion of tastes and textures, the activities brought out the joy, peace, playfulness and wisdom innate in all of us, and the women reminded me what support, acceptance and community can do to help a person flourish. - Yakira

DARK TAPESTRY

by Ruthie Pearlman

"So you don't think the flibbertigibbet could have done it?"

"Not sure. Let's try to find out a bit more about her."

The two policemen walked back into the Intergraph offices.

"Oh!" gushed Alicia, who was at the front desk manning the telephones. "We thought you had left."

"That was just our dastardly evil plan to catch you unawares," Colin told her. "We pretend we're leaving, but really we're hiding in the bushes out back. Then we sneak back in and catch you in the act."

Alicia opened her blue eyes wide. "We don't have any bushes out back," she said innocently. Colin sighed. "Is the Big White Chief around?"

"How!" said Don, coming out of an inner office and raising his right hand in a mock Native American greeting.

"Might we talk in your office?" Colin asked.

"Sure, come in."

Don's office was small and cluttered with computers and cables. He cleared some space on two chairs and they sat.

"We were wondering if you had an address for that temporary secretary you sacked."

"And a surname," White added.

"Sure, I have the one she gave me. Don't know if it's current, of course." Don opened a file drawer and rifled through it. He handed them a piece of paper.

"Cindy Wallis," Colin read aloud.

"Mightn't have been her real name, of course," mused White.

Colin looked Don straight in the eye. "Would you say, sir, that she was capable of sending untraceable e-mails and hacking? I know you said she was good, but was she that good?"

Don stared at him. "You think Cindy is the Fox?"

"We don't think anything. We are trying to find out."

"To be honest, my knowledge of Cindy is limited. She was only here a couple of weeks before we sacked her, but from what I know, I would say it was doubtful she was capable of such sophisticated techniques. Yes, she knew how to use a computer, and she knew her way around the Internet. She even knew Unix. But none of this is vastly unusual today. Most computer-literate kids study it in school and university. Doesn't turn them into sophisticated hackers."

"Had Cindy gone to university?"

"No, she was fresh out of high school, eighteen or nineteen years old when she worked for us. She said she had studied computing to A level and graduated with honors. I found that surprising, to be honest. She seemed like a social stereotype. Essex accent, sort of cockney, you know."

"And she drove a Ford Escort XR3i?" Colin asked, completing the stereotype.

Don grinned. "Didn't have a license, as far as I know. She came in by train. We're very close to the Camden Town station."

"Did she ever meet Josh?"

"Once, I think. Ilana would bring him into the office when he had school holidays and hadn't arranged any play dates. He was an only child and got bored at home on his own, but he loved playing with computers and pretending to help out, so we'd bring him in from time to time. Playing on the computer at home wasn't the same for him as being here, with all the staff. They all adored him; he was never a nuisance or a nag." Don stopped and grimaced. "It's got me doing it, too. Talking about Josh in the past tense."

"Try not to let it upset you. It's natural. Doesn't mean anything."

"I hope not."

Chevra Kadisha/Driver

Fixed term contract – 1 year

Bushey & Waltham Abbey Cemeteries

Starting salary £23,000 per annum

Would you like to feel that you are helping someone at a very low point in their life?

We are looking to appoint a full time member of the Chevra Kadisha to ensure the Burial Society continues to deliver a first class service to its members.

You will need to possess excellent interpersonal skills, be able to communicate in a compassionate manner with visitors and mourners and have the ability to deal with all matters relating to burial and tombstone consecrations. You will also be required to hold a full driving licence, and be able to perform the Tahara in accordance with the prescribed rites. Training will be given.

This is initially a one year contract but with the possibility for it to be made permanent.

Closing date for receipt of applications – 31 May 2019

To view the job description and apply for this position, please log on to our website www.theus.org.uk/vacancies

United Synagogue Registered Charity No. 242552

“Well, we’ll be off now. We’ll investigate Cindy and see what we can find out.” He shook hands with Don, partly as a human gesture of comfort. He turned to his sergeant. “Come on, Peter, stop slacking, man. There’s work to be done.”

Chapter Thirteen

Back in the car again, Colin and Peter looked at their watches. “It’s almost eleven. I want to be around when Miss Cleverlogs from Noo Yawk City arrives this evening. Until then, we have some time to kill.”

Stung by guilt for a second, Colin remembered a shiur he had attended long, long ago, when the speaker had talked about the RSPCT, the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Time, and how precious time was, how we mustn’t waste a second of it.

“We have some time to fill usefully,” he corrected himself, and Peter shot him a look.

“What are you looking at me like that for, White?”

“I think you’re going soft in the head, Colin. Ever since you started on this case you’ve been acting weird.”

“Have I?” Colin looked thoughtful.

“Yeah. It’s as if I don’t know you any longer. You’ve changed. You used to avoid Orthodox Jews like the plague. Now you’re gazing at ’em all misty-eyed and soppy like. What happened to the hard-nosed cop we all know and love, that’s what I’d like to know.”

“I’m still hard-nosed. And I never avoided them,” Colin lied. He felt disoriented.

“Did, too. Always used to send me into Goldbergs Green to do your dirty work, you did. I always thought you were antisemitic. Didn’t like to say much about it ’cause, well, each to their own and all that. But this is a real change of heart, or something’s happened and I don’t understand it.”

“You don’t understand anything, Peter,” Colin replied in a harsh undertone. “And to be honest, right now, neither do I. Now let’s go check out Miss Wallis.”

Baruch stood at the arrivals at Heathrow watching the passengers from the El Al flight LY315 come in through the doors. Would he recognize Avi Pincus if he saw him? It had been quite some time since they’d last met. Anxiously he scanned the crowds. Many similar-looking bearded men came out, but they looked blankly at Baruch. Surely Avi would remember him, even if he didn’t really remember Avi? Baruch shifted from one foot to the other and worried that he had missed him altogether.

Suddenly there he was, walking swiftly toward him, waving and smiling broadly, so familiar, how could he possibly have worried that he wouldn’t know him? The two men embraced warmly.

“Baruch, my friend! It’s good to see you!”

“Shalom aleichem, Avi! Welcome back to London.”

Avi looked around the arrivals lounge. “Seems like I’ve never left this place,” he said.

Baruch led the way to his car, parked on the third floor of the multistory parking lot. Avi carried only a small suitcase on wheels, which Baruch eyed curiously.

“Not planning on staying long, then?”

“I hope not. Without wishing to cast aspersions on your generous hospitality, I have a wife and kids out there, and I can’t leave them for too long. Also, I am hoping to achieve results quite fast.”
