Spice Of Life Retreat

"The retreat has changed my life"

"The spice of life retreat was a rejuvenating and revitalizing mind and body experience."

"Eradicated symptoms of a chronic health condition"

"I find that even now , months later I draw nourishment from all the different aspects of it."

"I am not the same person I was before the retreat. I see myself and life in different hues. I am so grateful to have had the experience and can't help waiting with anticipation the next one! "

Professional Counsellor Training

Do people often approach you for help?

Do you want to support others in the kehilloh?

Come and train as a qualified counsellor in a hemishe environment!

CPPD Counselling School offers the only BACP accredited training exclusively for charedi students in the UK.

Following the success of previous training, we are again running separate counselling training courses for men and women

Part-time Women's Certificate in Humanistic Integrative Counselling

Part-time Women's Diploma in Humanistic Integrative Counselling

Part-time Men's Certificate in Humanistic Integrative Counselling

Courses begin February 2020

Following this training you can apply for the Advanced Diploma course.
Upon successful completion you will qualify as a counsellor, eligible for BACP accreditation.

How to Apply

Visit www.cppd.co.uk/application and select Certificate or Diploma in Counselling (Orthodox)

Deadline for applications: Monday 16th December 2019

CPPD, Unit 1-2 Palace Gates, The Campsbourne, Hornsey, London N8 7PN • www.cppd.co.uk • mail@cppd.co.uk • 020 8341 4843

Your Questions Answered

Q: I many times find myself unsure of what to do with my teenage daughter. I know that it is good to let her be independent but how does that play itself out with decision making - how much do I tell her what is expected of her and how much can I leave up to her?

A: Mrs R. Rumpler 'שתחי', Therapist for Children & Young Adults and Founder of Side by Side

Answer: It is important to build up a relationship with your child – starting from a young age – that is based on respect and trust. A daughter or son must know that the parents respect her/him. When a child feels the parents respect they are able to clearly know the values of the home they have been brought up in. They will also understand, and in return respect, the unspoken rules of their home.

Peer Pressure - When a child feels peer pressure it often makes them do something that they may not necessarily want to do even if they feel it is not on par with their upbringing. Help your child to manage those differences. Particularly when you have to say no, help them to deal with it and to understand where she comes from and to be proud of herself and her family. Be careful with how you say a no. Make sure you understand where she is coming from and why it would be important to her. Try to be on the same page.

Being Independent – Generally if a child is brought up in a home with solid torahdig values and beliefs they will want to continue those beliefs. It is crucial that they feel the security, safety and positivity of their home because then they will want to please their parents as well as develop their own understanding. Discussing your child's dilemma will in fact encourage her to be truly independent and develop her maturity by enabling her to make difficult decisions that will become a source of pride to both herself and her parents.

Please note that answers are general guidelines. Each individual should consult with their Doctor/Moreh Derech.

DARK TAPESTRY

by Ruthie Pearlman

They parted company. Leora looked back at Ilana as she walked slowly up the street, pausing to examine each flowerbed and blossoming shrub. She reminded the younger woman of a small child taken on her first walk by a patient mother who allows the child free rein to pause at every insect, every piece of chewed-up gum and dried leaf along the path. An invisible hand led Ilana slowly up the pavement and waited calmly while she stopped to inspect and admire. She seemed to be turned inward, to be living her life from the inside outward, focusing on small flowering things that stayed where they were planted and did not vanish with the dawn as her son had done.

"Leave her be," Colin said softly. "She'll be okay. I promise you, she'll be okay."

Leora shot him a scathing look. "Don't ever promise something like that," she snapped. "How can you possibly know?"

Colin was taken aback at her vehemence. "I'm sorry," he mumbled.

"I know you aren't a religious man, and maybe you don't believe in anything, but I firmly believe there is only One Who can know," Leora went on, slightly softer now in the face of his humility. Suddenly it all seemed so horribly ridiculous, this charade. Like a clown with his makeup applied wrongly. Why did he have to pretend? "Look, it's not all as simple as you make out," he began.

"Oh, I know," she interrupted. "I'm sorry. I shouldn't make assumptions about other faiths." They reached Peter's place and Colin honked his horn. The moment for truths had passed. I think I might tell her, he thought. I think she might understand. It was a mind-blowing thought. He had known Lucy for years, and telling her his background had never occurred to him.

And yet to this stranger, this woman who had come on a big silver bird across the ocean into his life only three days ago, he felt he had to let her know he was not so different from her. He felt she would understand and not judge him for his divergence. Their eyes met briefly, and she flashed him a reassuring smile. The reassurance, misplaced as it was, comforted him nonetheless. Peter came lolloping out to the car like an overgrown rabbit, all legs and flapping raincoat in place of floppy ears. He was one of the so-called safe ones — married, with two small children. Peter had no long lonely evenings staring at the TV on his own; instead he spent his evenings trying to placate his wife and give quality time to his kids. Being a cop's wife didn't have many compensations and required much patience and calmness of spirit. Marie White had neither.

When she had married Peter as a young rookie, she had a stereotypical image of a policeman, all glamor and status. She never got used to his long working hours and interrupted free time when he would be called away in the middle of a dinner party or family outing. When he was actually at home, she found it hard not to harp on him for leaving her on her own so much. At one time, their marriage had almost failed. Then Peter had suggested she might like to get a part-time job now that the kids were in primary schooling. The job she found as a supermarket checkout girl was Marie's salvation; besides getting her out of the house, it enabled her to network with her peers and learn that her own marriage was not nearly as bad as some others she heard about. At least Peter was honest, hard-working, devoted, and loyal and brought home a reasonable pay packet that he didn't gamble away when her back was turned.

The two policemen, Colin and Peter, often exchanged confidences when they were working together. Peter had often asked him why he didn't marry Lucy, and that question Colin could not answer honestly. Was it the fact that she wasn't Jewish that really bothered him? Was it Peter's often negative complaints about married life that made Colin glad of his independence? If so, he would never tell Peter and possibly add fuel to the domestic battle fires. He would just mutter something about "not being the marrying kind, hate kids, though yours aren't too bad, I suppose" and leave it at that. Even if Marie wasn't the absolute perfect policeman's wife, his two children were the most perfect ever born to any man. He knew Colin tried his best to play the genial uncle when he came over for one of Marie's delicious home-cooked meals and appreciated his efforts to entertain Simon and Jenny with highly embellished "true crime" tales of cops and robbers.

"If you ever do get married and have your own, you'll see, they'll be the bees knees in your eyes," Peter had told him wisely, but Colin had merely shuddered at the idea of small beings taking over his life.

In the car now, Peter greeted Leora, who had moved to the back, and then said to Colin, "So what's the score?"

Leora took this to mean the British equivalent of "What's up?" and it probably was, but Colin decided to deliberately misinterpret.

"Manchester United totally decimated Tottenham last night," and soon the two men were totally immersed in soccer talk, arguing the finer points of the referee's handing out a red card to a favored player and if a goal should have been disallowed. Leora, whose knowledge of soccer was only marginally less than her knowledge of obscure Croatian dialects, tuned out and occupied herself with a tourist's eye view of glamorous Golders Green.

The journey took only five minutes or so. Colin drew the car up outside a semidetached house on a quiet street, the hum of the traffic on the main road safely a few streets away.

They all got out and stood, looking at the house. As Avi Pincus had described it, it had small bikes and toys littering the front garden and a general look of being lived in and in use. After rechecking the address and exchanging "this can't be right" glances with the other two, Colin marched up to the front door and rang the bell. A harassed-looking young woman opened it shortly afterward. She was pretty, wore an extremely elegant wig in a hair band, and was fully made up even at this early hour on a Sunday morning, but there was no disguising the dark circles under her big blue eyes and a sour pout to her mouth. She carried a large baby on one hip, and from the bowels of the house a toddler in full tantrum mode could be heard screaming and crashing about.

"Yes?" she asked impatiently. Colin could see that from her perspective the three of them looked rather like missionaries trying to sell her an alternative religion. And from their perspective, she looked just about ready to buy it.

"We're police officers, madam," Peter explained. "Might we ask you some questions, please?"

The young woman's expression changed from closed to defensive.

"Oh, gosh. Things are a bit hectic, as you can hear. You'll have to excuse Goldie; she's having a temper tantrum, and I don't want to give in just for the sake of peace."

"No problem," Leora said firmly, striding into the house, the two men following bemusedly after. Colin wasn't at all sure he wanted to excuse Goldie. They passed her lying on the living-room floor, toys littered around her, thrashing her small legs furiously, each kick threatening to disembowel yet another favorite plaything. The young woman seemed oblivious and took them into the kitchen, closing the door.
