The Shloh hakodosh writes that before beginning to daven it is incumbent for a person to spend a short time preparing his thoughts by concentrating on: the greatness of הקב"ה; the wonders and kindness that He does to a person every moment of the day and the gift to be able to stand in front of הקב"ה and daven.

Let us therefore recite ברכת השחר with added kavanah and appreciation.

Your Questions Answered

Q: I hear a lot about addiction in particular with regards to alcohol. I know people who drink and I would like to know what is actually considered addiction. Also, aside for a person having an addiction are there any other issues involved?

A: The typical image of the 'shtetel shiker' is not the only outcome of alcohol addiction. Addiction will often play out in stages. The brain and body's reactions at early stages of addiction are different from reactions during the later stages. There are four stages:

- Trying-out
- Regular use – using in a predictable pattern eg. every weekend
- Problem or risk - uses with disregard for consequences
- Dependency - uses on a daily basis despite possible negative consequences

Within the fourth stage of dependence there are various levels:

Levels of Dependence

1. Tolerance, when a person gets accustomed to it and therefore starts requiring more.
2. Physical dependence, when going without it elicits a withdrawal response.
3. Psychological dependence, when it becomes an urgent need, using more frequently, and using again after attempting to quit.

These stages are cumulative. For example, a person can have a tolerance for a substance without being physically dependent and be physically dependent without being psychologically dependent, but you cannot be psychologically dependent without being physically dependent and having developed a tolerance. A person at any stage of addiction will most likely be in denial.

Denial and Rationalisation

For someone with addictions or compulsions, denial is a subconscious defence mechanism. Whereas denial and rationalisation can to some degree effect non-addicted people, the magnitude of denial and rationalisation found in the addict are not found elsewhere. A typical example of this is when one addict will say about another "the difference between him and me is that I know what I am doing!" They are even capable of persuading others too. Therefore trying to persuade an addict to get help will not necessarily get him there.

Treatment

A person with addiction can be helped and there are many options and support available, yet the hardest part is for him to face his reality in order to get the help he needs. He keeps taking the route he knows best and not the route that is best for him.

Please note that these answers are general guidelines. Each individual should consult with their Doctor/Moreh Derech.

DARK TAPESTRY

by Ruthie Pearlman

"Oh, yeah, right, and Colin is the Sherlock Holmes of local policing, of course. How much really serious crime has he actually tackled in the past few years? Most of the stuff around here that you get is petty crime — burglary, car theft, breaking and entering, the occasional mugging or street brawling outside the pubs. You haven't had a case like this in all the years I've been your wife, that's for sure. And you have been Colin's partner as long as I have known you."

"I know, I know," Peter said, head in hands.

"So his experience of abduction, and yours, too, for that matter, can presumably be written on the head of a pin."

"Yes, probably."

There was a long pause.

"I protested," Peter said, not without some pride mixed in with the distress. "I'll probably get suspended."

" 'Course you won't," said the ever practical Marie. "I bet you shook 'em up some, though."

"You should have seen their faces," Peter said with a hint of a smile.

"I can't believe you are all going to just sit back and let the Fox win," Marie burst out angrily.

"Those two may be going to do that," Peter said slowly, "but I am not sitting back and doing nothing. I just can't do that to the Hardmans, or to Josh."

"Ooh," Marie exclaimed. "You going to do one of those 'I'm taking the law into my own hands' stunts?"

Peter grinned. "Sort of, only not so dramatic. I intend to have a long hard think about the best move to make, and then I'll make it, with or without Colin's approval."

Marie hummed. "Be careful, Peter. Doing things on your own might be risky, both to yourself and to Josh and his parents."

"I think overcautiousness hasn't helped much, either," Peter replied. "I'm convinced we might have found Josh by now if we had allowed Baruch Weiss to do that search."

"Peter. You aren't."

He looked at her. "I might."

"Please don't do anything rash," Marie pleaded. She knew that look in his eyes. It came up rarely, when reason seemed to desert him and instinct took over. It seldom led to anything sensible being achieved; on the contrary, more often than not she ended up bailing him out of trouble. On the other hand, it was the part of him that salvaged his personality and lifted it out of dullness, polished it and made it sparkle, like new silver.

"Sometimes," Peter said slowly, rolling each word around his mouth like hard candy, "you just have to flush foxes out of their lairs in order to resume the chase. In his lair a fox is safe. Out in the open country he is vulnerable."

"But there are infinite numbers of lairs for him to hole up in," Marie said.

"Yes, but this fox is different. He uses the Internet. And thus, as Abraham Pincus demonstrated, he is traceable, even if he thinks he isn't."

"You're going to get Abraham Pincus back?"

"No, I don't need to get him back. I just need to get him to keep watch in case anymore e-mails come. In the meantime, Mr. Baruch Weiss is finally going to have his day."

DAY NINE

CHAPTER TWENTY-THREE

Until now, Ilana Hardman had been reasonably content to leave matters to the experts. There were policemen and investigators and criminologists all out looking for her son, and she placed her trust in them. Foolish, foolish woman, placing her trust in a human being, she thought now. She had placed her trust in them, and they had let her down badly. They had tried, halfheartedly in her opinion, to find Josh, and now they had given up and abandoned her. Not case closed, exactly, but case on the back burner until something happened.

Ilana had gone to pieces and put herself back together again with Scotch tape. Fragile now, held together only by her faith in God, she walked through life like a paper doll, its body parts stuck together precariously. Any light breeze could blow her asunder.

Ilana had reestablished diplomatic relations with her friends and family, who, forgiving and understanding, drew around her like a shield, protecting her against the unprotectable. Even those who had no idea what to say to her were like trees of the forest safeguarding against the storm. They made her feel safe and loved and warm.

But no one brought back her son. No one had any ideas how to find him.

They davened with her, said tehillim with her, told her to be patient and brave, that God had His plan, that the dark side of the tapestry was indecipherable and eventually she would glimpse the right side and understand. She nodded and prayed and accepted all everyone said to her with a gentle smile.

But Josh did not come home.

Now she was restless. She felt that if the experts were as useless as dust, and her friends and family were supportive but helpless, then someone had to do something. Ilana resolved to take action. She'd start walking the streets of Golders Green looking for her son.

And so, like a lonely, lost soul in search of its Maker, she walked alone, calling his name. People thought it was odd, this tortured woman walking the spring streets calling for her child. The weather had turned; the long, unseasonably warm sunny spell had ended, and the day was cool, blustery, and rainy. More typical British May weather than the heat wave of the week before. Ilana wore a long, pale trench coat, PVC boots, and a scarf tied over her wig, and she walked, calling for her lost child. People moved aside to let her pass. Like a scythe through a field of wheat she moved through her people on the streets. Everyone pitied her; no one had the least idea how to help her.

When Don heard how she was spending her morning, he secretly feared for her sanity. He was not alone in this. Well-meaning friends called him at work and suggested in hushed tones that maybe she should be admitted to a clinic for psychiatric assessment. Sedated and drugged to the eyeballs, she would not embarrass the community any longer. Out of sight, out of mind. Josh was gone, and there was no use in pretending he would ever return. If Ilana couldn't cope with this, she should be "helped." People in the community had heard of other cases like this, women who had gone mad when intolerable tragedy had struck and had been institutionalized. The husband had been obliged to divorce her eventually and had remarried.

Don was angry when he heard these insidious ideas. He shook them off like a puppy shakes off the rain. He had to go on supporting Ilana, no matter what.

Meanwhile, Ilana walked the streets of Golders Green like a bag lady, searching.
