Restoring Your Body's Natural Balance

About reflexology

Reflexology is a form of alternative medicine that supports our body in self-healing, by tapping into its natural healing powers. Our feet are an intricate map of our bodies, and through massage and the application of gentle pressure in specific areas of the foot, we stimulate healing, bringing balance and rejuvenation to our body

Who benefits from a reflexology treatment?

Reflexology is suitable at all ages and stages. Whether baby, child or adult, reflexology supports the recovery of ailments, boosting the immune system, which in turn may prevent recurring infections. Amongst many other benefits, it also improves blood circulation, reduces fatigue and improves metabolism and digestive issues.

Reflexology throughout your pregnancy

As a non-invasive yet alternative method, reflexology is the perfect way to ease pregnancy symptoms and ailments. From back pain, constipation, lack of sleep to preparing your body for labour, reflexology will support you through it all.

What to expect in a reflexology treatment?

A 40-minute treatment includes assessing your current health situation, massaging and working on pressure points on the feet, as you relax in a reclining position. The treatment will leave you feeling relaxed, energised and back in balance.

The Arizal writes:

Before the תפלה one should except upon himself the וחרבת לרעד כמודד מצווה, and focus on loving each and every yid like himself (this includes thinking well of one another, not being judgemental, feeling each other's pain and farginning another's good fortune.) and through this his תפלת will be excepted with the תפלת of all ישראל.

He should therefore say clearly הריני מקבל עלי מצות עשה של ואהבת לרעד כמודד

Your Questions Answered

Q: Our five year old daughter seems to sometimes stutter when beginning a sentence and sometimes pauses in the middle of talking, takes a breath and then continues talking. We're wondering if this is something that can be helped at this age or is it better to wait for when she is older. If it can be helped, is there anything we can do with her at home?

Mrs R. Grunfeld Bsc (Hons)

Specialist Pediatric Speech and Language Therapist, MRCSLT MHCP

A: Answer: Statistics show that 5% of children between the ages of 3-5 years begin stammering. Of these, 4% will resolve naturally without any therapy input. Only 1% of children will continue to stammer into adulthood. There are some red flags which can indicate which of these children are at risk of stammering into adulthood. Identifying these children is important as early intervention is paramount in order to ensure that long term brain patterns are not created which are harder to resolve later on (past the age of 7/8).

Some of the red flags are the following:

- Delayed or conversely very developed language skills.
- High level of concern of the parents
- Male gender
- Family history of stammering into adulthood
- Specific patterns of stammering

Parents of children between 3-5 are advised to stay calm and patient and take an approach of 'watch and wait' initially, whilst keeping a diary of the intensity and pattern of stammering of the child in order to share this with a therapist, should therapy be needed in the future. If any of the above red flags applies, or the stammering does not resolve within a few months it is crucial to approach a qualified Speech and Language Therapist, who has specialised in childhood stammering. Unfortunately, too often I have met children after their parents have tried many unhelpful methods will usually are extremely expensive and time consuming ensuring that both parents and child are drained both financially and emotionally by the time the child is seen by an SLT. This greatly reduces the chances of success as both time has been lost and motivation is poor.

Please note that these answers are general guidelines. Each individual should consult with their Rav or Moreh Derech.

A Fourth Grader's Mesirus Nefesh

Fourth grader Yulia Izolada comes from a completely secular home, but thanks to her Shuvu School in Lod, she is well on her way towards a life of shemiras Torah and mitzvos.

Yulia's family was invited to her uncle's home for a family get-together on a Shabbos afternoon and, taking advantage of the beautiful weather, her parents decided to spend the morning hours going on a tiyul.

Yulia would not hear of it.

She decided to go to her uncle's home before Shabbos and spend the entire day there.

When her family arrived on Shabbos afternoon, she told them not to eat any of the food served, as she saw it had been cooked on Shabbos.

Yulia is desperately trying to keep Shabbos based on what she is taught at Shuvu. She has her hair done every Friday so that she won't have to touch it over Shabbos.

She also makes a point of letting her cellphone battery drain every Friday so that she won't have the urge to turn her phone on during Shabbos!

DARK TAPESTRY

by Ruthie Pearlman

Colin looked back, shocked and silent.

"Or you?" he demanded of Leora. "You've come all the way from New York to help us. Well, maybe now that we have all given up you can do what you really came here for. When is the guided tour of Buckingham Palace and the Houses of Parliament scheduled for? And don't forget Madame Toussaud's and the planetarium. An unmissable tourist attraction for anyone visiting London, wouldn't you say?"

Leora stared, openmouthed.

"I'm not that much off beam, am I, Ms. Jakober? You wanted to find Josh because the case fascinated you and it would look good on your CV. 'International criminologist' sounds so much better than 'New York criminologist,' doesn't it? So you came over, all enthusiastic and keen to help and hoping for some free time to see the sights. Thought finding Josh would be easy, just like one of your high-profile cases in America that made your name for you. But it wasn't a walkover, was it? Met your match in the Fox, and you don't like the feeling one bit, do you? So everyone is giving up, and the Hardmans don't count anymore. Well, I leave the telling to you, because I am not going to be the one to tell them that we are dropping the case for lack of effort."

He stopped for a moment, and an incredulous sneer came over his face.

"I don't believe what I am seeing and hearing from you guys, I really don't. You make me sick. I just hope you can live with yourselves after this, that's all."

With that, Peter walked out and slammed the door.

CHAPTER TWENTY-TWO

Her cry of anguish was like the death pangs of a whole people. The sound echoed through the world like glass shattering in a tall building, domino after domino crashing against each other, building into an unbearable crescendo of agonized pain and abandonment. The people she had trusted had turned blank, featureless faces toward her, blind masks willingly assumed to face her, nightmarish countenances which only a short time ago had been friendly, warm, human, real. She had clung to hope because those faces had given her hope. She had depended on Colin Sommers, because he was the investigating officer, and thus, like a doctor, he had the power to bring her cure, her solution, her closure. She had clung to Leora Jakober because she had perceived her as the conduit through which her son would be returned to her. She had seen her as the only friend worth having, the only friend who would understand and not judge. She had gently but firmly pushed all her other friends away; even her family had been discouraged and now did not know how to help her.

The shock of the doctor telling the patient that there was nothing more to be done, that the disease was terminal and she had no hope, that the kindly man in a white coat was in fact the Angel of Death, not the bringer of life, sent Ilana reeling. And Leora Jakober's apologetic hugs, saying that for now they had met a brick wall and would be just awaiting new developments, was the knockout blow as she staggered, disoriented, to her feet again. They had both looked acutely embarrassed, shuffling their feet and trying not to meet her eyes, but their faceless masks of abandonment carried their messages without pity.

"I...er...I guess I'll be moving out," Leora had said. "I wouldn't want to impose on your kind hospitality any longer."

Ilana had metabolized this remark somewhere deep in her psyche, her distress too acute for surface-level absorption. Subconsciously she assumed this meant Leora would be flying back to the United States, her mission a failure. Somehow this would have been more comforting than the truth had Ilana known it.

Leora was staying in London a while longer, in a hotel in the West End, and true to Peter's accusations was seeing the sights. The accusation was not entirely justified; part of the reason she did not fly back immediately was that she was hoping something would turn up in the Josh Hardman case, some new evidence or development. But in the meantime, the other reason remained; while she was waiting for developments, why waste the gorgeous late-spring weather just hanging around when she could be seeing London?

Leora Jakober was not a devious young woman. She had her heart in the right place and was genuinely distressed at the Hardmans' tragedy. But it was exactly because she was not hypocritical about her feelings that she could not look Ilana in the eye and say her missing son had been her only motive for wanting to come to London. Besides a natural interest in a great city unvisited, her torment at not being able to help at this time was tempered with the slightest feeling of relief that she had a small oasis of time to spend alone.

In her mid-twenties and living alone in New York, Leora had become slightly intolerant of crowded living spaces. She loved people and interacted with them well, but at the end of her workday she liked to close her own front door on the world and keep it at bay.

With the Hardman case, she had been living, breathing, eating, and sleeping Josh Hardman. Staying in the same house as the distraught parents had been useful, perhaps even necessary, but it had been extremely claustrophobic. Even in her luxuriously appointed guest room with its own shower, she could not escape the tragedy that had befallen this family. It seeped under the door, through cracks in the floor, through the very fabric of the walls, to engulf her. During the first few days in London, she had embraced the overwhelming aura because she had needed it to investigate the crime, but now that there was a hiatus, she needed her space again.

"We promise to contact you the minute there are any new developments," Colin had told Ilana before departing. He left on her kitchen table a contact number for bereavement counselors. The piece of paper promised, in tasteful purple script decorated with flowers and scrolls, to support, help, and advise people who had recently suffered loss of any kind. It reached out to her with insincere, disingenuous hands. Alone, Ilana sat in her kitchen, hugging herself and rocking back and forth, back and forth, a strange keening sound coming from her mouth. She was the last woman on earth. Abandoned, deserted, alone.

Those she had trusted had turned their backs on her and went back to their safe, happy lives. Don could not reach her. Though he, too, shared her acute anguish, he understood that there had been no new developments and that it might be better to sit tight for a while and see. In business, sometimes chasing after the elusive butterfly only drove it away forever. Sit still and wait, and it may yet alight on your hand.
