Parenting is a lifelong series of questions.

But what happens when you can't find the answers?

Will my child ever grow out of this behavior?

Am I doing something wrong that's causing my Bochor's difficulty?

How can it be that, just six months ago, things were so different?

Is there something I can do to motivate my child?

Am I wasting my time and money on therapy?

Are my expectations of my child unreasonable?

How am I supposed to know what will help my child?

Do I need to just accept that this child might be different?

Does my child need to be evaluated?

Is it too late in the game to regain some control of my child's situation?

Is medication the only solution for my child's anxiety?

1. How can I avoid the constant debating with my teenager?

2. Why is she not as social as her sister?

1. Is there anything I can say in my child's difficult moment that will calm him down?

Is there a way for my job as a parent to become just a bit easier?

You will be amazed!

DARK TAPESTRY

by Ruthie Pearlman

The boy nodded and pocketed the card carefully. "I'll have a think tonight when it's quiet," he assured the policeman. "I've got a really good memory." Colin smiled and patted the boy again. "Good lad." He got up. "I'll see you later." He walked out, smiling to himself as the boy ran past him to rejoin the football game.

Walking out again into the warm spring evening, Colin breathed in the scent of the lilac bushes that bordered the Brandt house. Spring this year was full of hope. What a conundrum. In the midst of so much burgeoning beauty and new life was a tragedy in the making.

He walked slowly back down the road until he came to the boy with the red bike, who was still zooming around like a wild animal in a circus ring.

"Hiya!" Colin called in a friendly fashion.

The boy stopped and looked at him. "Hi!" He waved and made another circuit.

Colin waited until he came close again, then said, "Son, can I ask you something a mo', please?"

The boy skidded to an abrupt halt in front of him, barely missing Colin's toes. "Yeah?"

"Careful, lad, careful. Don't want you hauled in on a GBH, do we now?"

"What's a GBH?"

"Grievous bodily harm, son. Like you taking me toes off, for instance."

The boy looked down at the juxtaposition of his front wheel tire and Colin's foot and grinned.

"Whoops, sorry."

"Well, can we have a chat?"

"About Josh? Yeah, sure." The boy looked around. The street was emptying out. "Here?"

"Wherever you say. You're the boss. What's your name, by the way? I never asked."

The kid flashed another grin at Colin. "It's Mikey Mendelsohn. I know a good place. Follow me."

Chaining his bike to the front gate of his house, he led Colin round the back into a narrow passageway that led between his house and next door's. The alley, overgrown with weeds and vicious nettles, led to a small copse at the apex of the point where the two houses joined at the back.

"I made a secret house here," said Mikey. "No one knows about it 'cept me and Josh Hardman and Moishie Brandt."

Colin's heart thumped. "Show me."

Mikey ran ahead through dense undergrowth awash with wildflowers and brambles, apparently impervious to scratches and stings. Colin followed more cautiously, glad of his thick twill suiting and stout shoes. When he got to the spot, he stopped and stared.

If it hadn't been for Mikey leading him there, he would never have found it, so perfectly was it hidden among the brambles and shrubs: a tiny house, scarcely larger than a playhouse, constructed painstakingly out of old wooden pallets split up into their original planks and reformed. No glass in the two windows, but some ragged curtains fluttered. A door consisting of half a pallet closed with a hook-and-eye arrangement. Colin walked around the structure wonderingly.

"This is incredible. Did you build this?"

"Yes, me and Josh and Moishie. We all helped. Oh, and Daddy did, too. They're his pallets. Daddy has a business," he added importantly.

Colin peered in through one of the windows, pushing the torn curtain aside.

Inside was a battered, old cushioned chair, a small table, and two wooden boxes, one face up, full of bits and pieces, the other on its side, divided in two to form a crude bookcase. Some storybooks and a plastic-covered siddur stood in the bookcase. Colin recognized the siddur though it was no longer a part of his life. He looked around the tiny room to see if there was anything that might point to the abductor having held Josh here at any stage — a mug and a cup, a packet of cookies, a candy bar wrapper. "Those mugs and cups yours?" Colin said, pointing. Mikey went in through the door, while Colin stayed where he was, peering in through the window. The boy picked up the items. "Yes, we bring drinks down here sometimes."

"So there is nothing here you don't recognize? Anything that isn't yours?"

Mikey looked around again. "No, nothing. All ours." He picked up the candy bar wrapper, stuffed it into his pocket, and left the little house.

Colin took out a card and scribbled his home phone number on the back. As he handed it to the child, he said, "Can I ask you to do some police work for me?"

Mikey positively glowed at the idea. "Sure!"

"Here's my home number and that's my office number on the front. I'd like you to come back here when you can but quietly and secretly and take a very careful look around. If you see anything you don't recognize, anything that might have been put there by someone else other than you and your friend Moishie, phone me at once. Okay?"

"Okay!" The boy winked. "You can rely on me. I'll sneak in real quietly and look around."

"Good lad! I'm off now. Keep in touch. And remember," Colin tapped the side of his nose, "mum's the word!"

Mikey looked puzzled for the first time in their exchange, and Colin realized, with a start, the extent of the culture gap between them. Mikey had never heard that phrase before. "It means keep it a secret," Colin explained, and the boy's face cleared instantly. "Right! Don't worry!"

As Colin walked back to his car, his mobile phone rang. It was the desk sergeant back at the station. "Better get back here sharpish, sir," the desk sergeant said. "The Hardmans have received another e-mail."

Chapter Nine

Colin arrived back at the station to find Don and Ilana waiting for him. Ilana was sobbing uncontrollably, and Colin's heart went out to her. Fearing the worst, Colin wordlessly took the printout Don was clutching and scanned it quickly.

You call me misbeliever, cutthroat dog

Revenge is a dish best eaten cold,

"A poet yet," Colin said grimly.

"I didn't want to call. I didn't want to come here!" Ilana wailed. "I'd rather take a chance and have my son back safely than risk him knowing I've contacted you."

Don and Colin locked eyes for an instant.

"I know how she feels, but you've done the right thing," Colin said. "We'll sit down together and think about this e-mail. It may contain clues." He signaled to a woman police constable. He needed to ask Don some questions, and Ilana's distress was distracting. "Come along and have a nice cuppa." The kindly WPC took Ilana away. "I'll give it to you in a polystyrene cup. I've sent someone out for some kosher milk. There's a shop just up the road." Ilana allowed herself to be led off.

"I don't think she's much use right now, to be honest," Colin explained to Don. "Needs to calm down."

Don nodded his agreement. "She's been spaced out on and off ever since it happened, sometimes alert and lucid and at others totally out of it. This second e-mail seems to have tipped her over the edge. She's done nothing but sob since it arrived."

"Do you think she'll calm down enough to think about who might have sent this e-mail?" Colin asked.

"I don't know. At the moment, my wife is not herself. But the wife I do know is strong and resourceful. She'll conquer her hysteria if she knows it will help find Josh."
