BUILDING BLOCKS of CHESSED

BY RABBI Y YODAIKEN

NEW FROM FELDHEIM

THE WORLD IS BUILT ON CHESSED...

That's how essential this concept is to Creation and Jewish life. Rabbi Yodaiken takes teaching chessed to our children head-on. Here is a sefer devoted to instilling this fundamental trait in our children and students. Overflowing with uplifting insights from Gedolei Torah and filled with positive tools and practical strategies, this volume will inspire our children to live lives that epitomize this glorious midah.

Available at Jewish book stores or at Feldheim.com

DARK TAPESTRY

by Ruthie Pearlman

Chapter Twelve

Don was stunned and pleased. During the past five days she had shown little interest in anything. It seemed the impending arrival of Leora Jakober had infused Ilana with new life for the first time. He sent up a silent prayer that her arrival would not be a let-down. If that were to happen, he said to Hashem, it will destroy my wife. Please don't let that happen.

"I shall get dressed and put on makeup," she announced suddenly. "I haven't worn makeup for days now." She peered at her face in the mirror. "Oh, dear. My skin looks all flaky and dry." She washed her hands and face, then applied a liberal layer of moisturizer. Don watched his wife come to life again and prayed anew that this rebirth was not a temporary blip in her general downward spiral.

"You haven't been doing much of anything lately," he said gently. "I'm glad to see you taking care of yourself again."

"This moisturizer just sank right in. My skin is so dry. Why didn't you tell me, Don, how horrendous I have been looking?" She reached into the tub and pulled out a large glob of cream and applied it, feeling her skin drink thirstily.

"It would have fallen on deaf ears," he said, and she nodded her acceptance of this truth. "I'll wait for you downstairs, okay? How about some breakfast?"

"I would love some scrambled eggs on toast," Ilana said brightly, "and gallons of hot coffee."

Don saluted. "Coming up, ma'am." Feeling lighthearted for the first time in days, he went downstairs.

She dressed smartly in a light suit and a newly done sheitel that had been sitting in her closet for weeks. She had been wearing an old ratty one, not caring how she looked.

"I'm still alive," she said to her reflection in the mirror as she applied makeup. "I am me and I am alive, and I am going to help find my son." Smiling, she went downstairs.

After the most nutritious meal she had managed to eat (and enjoy) since it happened, Ilana was ready to accompany Don into the office. She had even put perfume on, Don noted as he helped her into the car. Ilana left instructions for Maria and they drove off.

Colin Sommers was waiting for them in his car when they arrived at the offices of Intergraph in Camden Town, with Sergeant White sitting next to him. When the Hardmans pulled up and parked, Colin and Peter got out of their car and stood waiting for the Hardmans to unload whatever they needed to take in with them.

It was a cool but bright spring morning. The sun dazzled as it bounced off small puddles left by overnight rain, puddles which residues of gasoline turned into shimmering rainbows. The leaves on overhead trees were rustling as crisply as new currency. Ilana breathed in deeply. "Mm. What a simply gorgeous day!"

They all walked into the offices together. The secretaries were the front line of defense. One, white-haired and bespectacled, was sitting at a reception desk manning a switchboard while she typed letters on an old-fashioned electric typewriter. It had been so long since Colin had seen anything other than a computer for typing that he couldn't resist the urge to go around the edge of the desk and take a peek at this historic machine.

"Luvaducks, it's been yonks since I've seen one of these," he commented, half-sitting on the edge of the desk. The secretary looked at him curiously until Don explained who he and Sergeant White were and why they were there.

"I'm afraid I belong to a bygone age," the secretary, who introduced herself as Mary Nolan, said. "An age where even this machine, aided by electricity, is an innovation. In my day we typed on manual Remingtons and had to use considerable force to get the keys to type.”

“But don’t you think that maybe typing on a computer might be useful? If you make mistakes, you don’t have to use correction fluid.”

Mary Nolan shot Colin a supercilious look. “Inspector, I don’t make mistakes. The very few occasions I have been forced by circumstance to use the office computer to type on, it has behaved in a most unpredictable manner. Giving me blue screens and error messages, crashing so that I lose all my work.”

“You’re meant to save it, Mrs. N.,” Don said kindly.

“Save,” Mary said scornfully. “I type on this typewriter, I don’t need to save. It’s just there.”

“Mary,” Colin said, “have you known all the employees in this company for some time?”

“Well, now, let’s see. The partners themselves, of course. They were all here when I was employed, and they’re still here now.”

“How long ago was that?”

“Five years.”

“That’s about how long this business has been running, Detective Inspector,” Don explained. “The Internet itself has scarcely been user-friendly for that long. Before 1994, the Net was under the control of a bunch of nerdy propeller-head academics who were absolutely horrified at the idea of the Internet being anything other than a tool for university lecturers to exchange information. Once our dear friend Bill Gates started making user-friendly software and the World Wide Web was introduced, more and more ‘ordinary’ people started using it, too.”

“I know,” Colin said, feeling patronized. “I do recall in my dim and distant past when the Internet belonged to a few university people who tried their best to pretend it was difficult to use so no one would encroach on their territory.”

“Bill Gates became the most hated man in history at one time,” Ilana put in with a grin. “Of course, there are still plenty of Unix snobs out there who think anyone using Microsoft products is a sad loser.”

“So you started Intergraph when the Net started becoming user-friendly,” Colin summed up.

“Yes, we were in at the beginning when hardly anyone else was designing Web sites, and we had the lion’s share of the market for a while. At least, here in London. Later on the pie grew. Our slice shrank, and we had to work harder to win clients. Every man and his dog could design his own Web site. We had to show them how a corporate Web site should look.”

Mary Nolan had very little to contribute to this conversation except to say that she knew all the present staff fairly well and the technical staff, too. The latter she regarded rather maternally as they all seemed to be scarcely out of school.

“Myself and Alicia have been the only two secretaries from the year dot. Mr. Hardman, he doesn’t hold with getting these flibbertigibbet young typists. He knows quality when he sees it, even if we don’t know much about computers. The world got along quite nicely before computers came along, and it can continue on its merry way after computers are dead and gone, too.” She paused. “When Alicia was ill, they took on a flibbertigibbet for a while, and they never did it again, I can tell you!”

“Troublesome, was she?” asked Colin.

“Not exactly troublesome as much as lazy, I think. She knew her way around computers too well. Used them to play rather than work. She went on-line and chatted to people and played games,” said Mary Nolan disapprovingly.

“It’s lucky we have a permanent connection, or she’d have ended up costing us money in phone bills as well as wasted time and lost work,” Don said grimly.
